 observes, "It is easy to see the point of counter attack. So judgment will not work. Along with the allusion of destroying pieces of our stances to instruct us to see that enforcing our unrooted "helpful pieces of advice" also are usually not very effective in changing behavior because if both of these common sense are not melted in our dealing with people, how can we bring change where we know change to come?"

Well, first, I must acknowledge that there is likely just much less difference between what we think about ourselves and what we think about others. The problem is not that we are not critical of ourselves or critical of others. It is easy to see the point of counter attack. So judgment will not work.
