The process of growing tobacco remains a very long and laborious year-round undertaking despite the technological advances that have eased the process of producing other crops. The cycle includes planting plug plants by hand (above), keeping the plants healthy during the growing season (hopefully with the cooperation of Mother Nature), harvesting by hand (below, left), curing the crop in ventilated sheds, stripping the leaves from the stalks and baling them (not shown) and finally delivering the finished product to market (below, right).
