The Primary Virtues

While all the virtues have their role to play in a well-ordered life, some are more central than others. Aristotle thought that justice was the central virtue, at least in part because we are social animals and the virtue of justice concerned the reciprocity between members of society. Justice requires that we give to each other their fair share and not demand more for ourselves than is due us. But courage is also central to the moral life, because it requires courage to say and do the right thing, especially when doing the right thing may entail something fearful or dangerous. Courage is more than just doing one's duty in times of war or standing up to bullies. It is doing the right thing no matter what the circumstances. Temperance or self-control is another primary virtue, because without it we may be moved to act solely for pleasure, and not out of a concern to do what is right. A person who cannot control himself, whether in connection with anger, fear, or pleasure, is bound to be set adrift by his or her passions and by the fleeting emotions of the moment. While all of these virtues are praised throughout the Bible and are probably universal, there can be little doubt that Judeo-Christian morality puts love at the center. If we could just love each other everything else in the moral realm should fall into place.

“Jesus replied: ‘Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind.’ This is the first and greatest commandment. And the second is like it: ‘Love your neighbor as yourself.’ All the Law and the Prophets hang on these two commandments.”

Matthew 22:37-40
