

Happiness is a cold nose in the morning.

Several licks better. People who are happy to see you, and better trained to serve you. Unconditionally and genuinely. Professionally and respectfully. Not just companions, but friends. Time and activities not just shared but enjoyed every day.

Of course, pets are welcome. This is home. It's why 95% of our residents and families would recommend an Americare community to others*.

Welcome home.

Find yourself in a happier place.

Suspected killer caught by tissue

SACRAMENTO, CALIF. (AP) — DNA from a tissue left in a trash can led authorities in April to arrest a former police officer suspected of being California's notorious, elusive Golden State Killer, according to warrants released Friday.

Documents released by a judge at the request of news outlets detail the case Sacramento County sheriff's investigators pieced together to obtain arrest and search warrants for 72-year-old Joseph DeAngelo, who is facing murder charges in multiple counties.

DeAngelo is suspected of committing at least a dozen killings and roughly 50 rapes in the 1970s and '80s.

After investigating for more than 40 years, police zeroed in on DeAngelo by using genealogical websites to identify potential relatives of the killer based on DNA collected at a crime scene.

Investigators used DNA from a semen sample collected at the double murder of Lyman and Charlene Smith in 1980 in Ventura County to find one of DeAngelo's relatives and eventually the suspect himself, according to the warrants.

After identifying DeAngelo as a suspect, investigators followed him to a store outside Sacramento and took a swab from the door handle of a car he exited. That sample didn't immediately lead to an arrest.

Three days later, investigators collected trash from cans left outside DeAngelo's home in Citrus Heights, Calif. A piece of tissue plucked from the trash proved to be the piece of evidence they needed to obtain an arrest warrant, according to the documents.

DeAngelo was arrested several days later and has since been charged with 12 counts of murder in Sacramento, Ventura, Santa Barbara and Orange counties. Prosecutors haven't decided where he'll be tried.
