

Standard online reader survey

General Motors has announced the return of the Chevy Blazer.

Q: What is your favorite car brand?

Ford
Chevrolet
Toyota
Nissan
Volkswagen

EDITORIAL

At the very least, we can be polite

News coming from the nation's capital Saturday morning indicated White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders was kicked out of a Virginia restaurant because she works for President Donald Trump.

Sanders said via Twitter she was told by the restaurant owner in Lexington, Va., she had to leave and she said she politely left.

Sanders said the incident at The Red Hen on Friday night said far more about the owner of the restaurant than it did about her.

"I always do my best to treat people, including those I disagree with, respectfully and will continue to do so," Sanders said in the tweet, which generated 22,000 replies in an hour.

Former Arkansas Governor and Sanders' father, Mike Huckabee, responded in a tweet that the "Hate Plate" must be on the menu at The Red Hen.

This incident is a very sad commentary on how we've sunk, collectively, when it comes to political disagreements. The days where we can hold different political views and still be friends appear to be fading into the sunset.

President Trump remains very popular in Warren County and in Tennessee overall. This is not necessarily the case in other parts of the country where the president's approval rating is not so glowing.

Regardless of how you feel about a person, it is undoubtedly very rude to ask them to leave because of their political affiliation. We realize private business owners have the right to deny service, but it doesn't better our plight as a nation to throw someone out of a restaurant because they work for Mr. Trump.

On a local level, it was startling when Commissioner Michael Martin yelled at people during a county committee meeting earlier this month and threw one person out of the room.

When there is so much anger on the national level, it trickles down to state and local governments and infects all of us.

Unfortunately, nastiness has become the new norm. The best way for us to move forward and continue to set the standard as the greatest country in the world is to show some concern and compassion for our fellow Americans.

We may disagree on immigration and tax cuts for the rich, but there's no reason to be hateful whether it be in person, or on social media.

WWII veterans fading fast

"D-Day vet dies at 93." That headline in the Southern Standard last Wednesday announced the death of World War II combat veteran and former POW William Magness Jordan. He was on the cusp of 94 when he died peacefully last Sunday at his home with his loved ones gathered around him.

The death of the man most we knew as Magness Jordan serves as a poignant reminder of the passing of the WWII generation. As each day passes, the memories of that long-ago war, with its sights, sounds, tragedies and triumphs, fade even further.

Facing the inexorable fate of Father Time, the brave American men and women who fought and helped win World War II are now in their late 80s and 90s. And their numbers dwindle down to a precious few. Of the 16 million Americans who served our nation in WWII, only 558,000 were alive in 2017. And nearly 400 of them are dying by the day in 2018.

To put these numbers in perspective, we need to recall that when these 16 million Americans served and sacrificed so much, the U.S. population was only about 132 million people. That means roughly 1-in-8 Americans were in harm's way.

Nearly 292,000 were killed in action, another 114,000 died in the war, and nearly 671,000 were wounded. Thus, nearly every family in America was touched by the heavy hand of war.

Numbing as these numbers are, we must never forget that each of these American casualties had a name, and a heart and a soul. All gave some, and those who gave all in WWII left families and loved ones behind who missed and mourned them beyond measure.

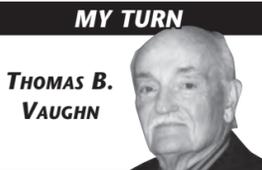

As our beloved WWII veterans continue to pass from the American scene, it is up to us, you and me, to honor them all before they fade away. One way to do that is by supporting our favorite veterans organizations. Another is by contributing to The National WWII Museum.

"There's no time to lose," said Gordon H. "Nick" Mueller, President & CEO Emeritus of the Museum. "We want to be able to finish and dedicate our expansion while we still have members of the greatest generation (around) to thank for their sacrifice and service to the nation and to show the world what they mean to the principle of freedom."

Well said, Nick. I'm doing all I can to help honor our WWII veterans, including supporting the museum.

For information on how you can help the museum, too, contact their office online: info@national-ww2museum.org or call 1-504-528-1944.

Retired Army Col. Thomas B. Vaughn can be reached at tbvwm1@blomand.net.

THOMAS B. VAUGHN

It is OK if we disagree

"The problem is not that we disagree, but that our disagreements have become so callous, emotional and inconsiderate," wrote Michael Wear in his book "Reclaiming Hope." Wear used to work for President Obama on faith-based and neighborhood partnerships.

I was reading through "Reclaiming Hope" just hours after a memorial Mass for Michael Potemra, my colleague at National Review, the other day. He was an excellent editor, but Mike didn't agree with every word of the magazine published. None of us do, but he'd at least be funny about it.

The same day of Mike's memorial Mass, Melania Trump wore that jacket on the plane to visit migrant children who had been separated from their parents. "I really don't care, do u?" the jacket read. To me, it seemed pretty clear what it was about from the get-go.

Wasn't there obsessive coverage recently about her having "gone missing" from the public eye after surgery? I'm convinced the whole business with the jacket will get her husband's party more votes in the midterm elections.

That's where we are in America today. No Trump started the fire. As Wear put it, "Donald Trump is responsible for his actions, but the table was set for his election by what we deemed acceptable in our politics -- and in ourselves. ... The polarization of our politics and our communities is a defining feature of modern American life. Our inability to understand and empathize with our neighbors is straining our society to its breaking point."

Wear goes on: "Our politics is now predicated on making those who disagree with us beneath our notice. This is to the benefit of those who run for office and of the interest groups structured to ignore alternative viewpoints. But it is not at all to our collective benefit. We the people cannot allow our neighbors to become invisible, for doing so makes living together peaceably and fruitfully nearly impossible."

Charles Krauthammer died the same day as the memorial Mass for Mike. I only knew him a little, compared to many friends who worked with him day in, day out on Fox

News and elsewhere. But he taught me about things fundamental to Christianity.

In his final column, Charles wrote: "I believe that the pursuit of truth and right ideas through honest debate and rigorous argument is a noble undertaking. I am grateful to have played a small role in the conversations that have helped guide this extraordinary nation's destiny."

Wear cites C.S. Lewis: "A sick society must think much about politics, as a sick man must think much about his digestion. However, if either comes to regard it as the natural food of his mind -- if either forgets that we think of such things only in order to be able to think of something else -- then what was undertaken for the sake of health has become itself a new and deadly disease."

A better politics requires us being better. Good men come and go, daily, who remind us it's possible, even among a nation of pundits.

Kathryn Jean Lopez is senior fellow at the National Review Institute. She can be contacted at klopez@nationalreview.com.

KATHRYN LOPEZ

www.gocomics.com

STAHLER. 6/23

© 2018 Jeff Stahler/Dist. by Andrews McMeel Syndication

Established 1879

Southern Standard

Publication No. 506-840

Patricia Zechman, Publisher
James Clark, Editor

Phyllis Vanatta, Business Manager
Dale Stubblefield, Circulation Director

Phone: 473-2191
105 College St., McMinnville, TN 37110
FAX: 473-6823

Email: standard@blomand.net
Website: www.southernstandard.com

Copyright Standard Publishing Company,
All Rights Reserved

JUST A THOUGHT

LISA HOBBS

One method to kill mosquitoes

It is mosquito season and everyone's thoughts swiftly turn to eradication of the blood-sucking little creatures. Well, here's my suggestion.

A few years ago, I had a major problem with mosquitos. The word "major" is not an exaggeration. You couldn't walk outside without getting attacked by hundreds or thousands. I attempted to minimize exposure as much as possible and hoped the problem would just go away.

Then, I'm standing in the kitchen watching my dog play in the yard. She can go out alone. However, I have to be watching. When she thinks about leaving the yard, she'll look toward the door. I wouldn't lie to you. She's mischievous and smart. She's looking to see if I'm watching. I say something like, "Don't even think about it."

I noticed something weird. It appeared to be a large, blackish cloud around her. It didn't take me long to realize those were mosquitos. How many mosquitos does it take to make a large, black cloud visible that far off? Thousands, I'm guessing. That moment is when I realized I would have to take steps to correct this situation.

Stage one would be annihilation of the ones living. I started doing some online searches to determine the best way to go about it. I needed something that was effective -- duh. I also needed something that would not hurt Baby. It's her yard. I only mow it every other weekend.

I eventually stumbled on a site that suggested the use of liquid Ivory soap. Specifically, filling one of those large spray bottles and filling it with soapy water and spraying the yard, house, bushes, trees, etc. It stated mosquitos need water to drink and the soap would kill them when they did. However, it wouldn't damage the environment or hurt my dog.

I decided to spray late in the evening when it was the coolest and the heat wouldn't, hopefully, evaporate the mixture. Over the next hour at about 10 p.m., I sprayed four or five bottles full. I hosed everything down. Nothing was left untouched.

Then, as I waited to see if that would work, I started phase two. Most people understand that mosquitos need standing water to breed and it doesn't take much water for that to occur. Approximately eight days later and you have adult mosquitos. I started the search to find the breeding sites. I found several and removed them.

I'm not kidding you when I say this: two to three days after spraying, the mosquito population was almost nonexistent. It being Ivory, there was an added benefit of everything smelling wonderful. It didn't kill the grass, bushes or trees. I live out in the country and this method worked for me. I'm unsure if it would work for a homeowner with close neighbors. Phase two would be difficult, if you have neighbors who just do not care.

The cost was $3 for the soap and $5 for the sprayer. Money well spent.

Standard reporter Lisa Hobbs can be reached at 473-2191.