

Grant money a real life-saver to DeKalb Ambulance Service

DUANE SHERRILL

Smithville, Tennessee

New machines given to the DeKalb Ambulance Service could not only improve patient care but save lives.

The department recently received three auto vents and three endo-bright scopes through grant money which they will use while transporting patients.

"Sometimes our patients are not able to breath on their own," said Cody Johnson of the DeKalb County Ambulance Service, explaining the usefulness of the auto-vent. "Using that we can better control their breathing and the amount of oxygen they get in their lungs."

The machine is customizable for all patients and will help control their ventilation rate.

The video scopes they received will help when they need to put a tube down a patient's throat.

"Before, we had to visually look down and insert the tube," Johnson said. "With the scope we can look down their throat and see any obstruction and see how we can best insert the tube."

RANDY BOYD

Boyd noted his does have governmental experience. He previously served in Governor Bill Haslam's cabinet as the state Commissioner of Economic and Community Development, and earlier while serving as the Governor's Special Advisor on Higher Education was the architect of the state's Drive to 55 workforce development initiative, and the tnAchieves and Tennessee Promise scholarship programs to help more young people go to technical or community college tuition-free.

Along with touting his experience as a business leader and in helping shape programs in the state, Boyd said he has a vision on how to combat the opioid issue that is spreading throughout Tennessee and the nation.

"It's decimating our state," Boyd said of the opioid crisis. "We have to declare war."

Boyd pointed out that Tennessee has the most prescriptions, per capita, than any state in the country. "Twice the average than the rest of the country," he explained. "Minnesota has the same population but we prescribe ten times more pill per person than they do.

There's no reason for it." Boyd added that incarceration isn't necessarily the best course of action. Instead, he believes treatment could pay dividends by returning addicts back into the workforce, clean from their addiction.
