

Clinton schools recognize Rising Arrows for first nine-weeks

Special to The Clinton Courier

There are hundreds of children in Clinton's public schools who are not on honor roll, not the star of their sports team, or not at the top of their class.

But they come to school every day and do their work, they are courteous to teachers and staff, they help other students and they excel in ways that may not be quantified. The new Rising Arrow award honors students who are quietly working to make the world a better place.

"We began this award to recognize students who demonstrate integrity and good character," said Dr. Tim Martin, superintendent of schools. "They help others in need, both at school and in their community. They are kind to others. They do the right thing without being asked, only because it's the right thing to do. The Rising Arrow award is a way to say thank you for being good people, and not just good students."
