to have someone just as passionate about my hobby. The fact that she had her own engine to run was attractive. It's harder to tear her away from the engine at the end of the day," Trevor explained.

Not only does this tech savvy generation enjoy working on the hill during the show, but they spend a lot of time out there throughout the summer months working and if they had to, they could homestead a farmstead like it was the late eighteen hundreds. "It would be an adjustment. When they built steam engines, they didn't come with manuals. It was like here's your engine, have at it," Kelsey started off and went on to say, "But we'd get creative and find a way or a very crafty blacksmith."

The next generation isn't exactly sitting on the porch snapping peas or whittling their ways with the little Whipper Snappers, but they do understand the importance of tending to the roots. "It's getting to the age that no one saw those steam engines operating in fields when they were kids," Trevor pointed out and went on to say, "We will raise our kids out there. Their faces will be covered in
