The Old Fashioned Family

Ron Cowell

My Father, Mother, Sister and me in the photo! Some remember the 50's and 60's as the golden age of family values and community. A time when family stayed close together and people conformed to set rules of respectability and decency. The number one rule at home was clear, adults are in charge and kids must behave or bear the consequences.

Times were hard and many households struggled to make ends meet. Kids survived with just a few books and toys, but the freedom to roam more than made up for that. Dads went out to work and Mom ran the home and stretched the family allowance as far as she could.

It's easy to forget that a small thing for a family today, like take away fish and chips, that was a real treat back then. If all this sounds familiar, give your self a moment to be a kid again drift back in time and remember those days and how much they have changed since then.

It was Dad's job to bring home the bacon and act as the head of the household especially when it came to disciplin and big decisions. Times were changing and, while it was still common for fathers to keep the kids in line, many were choosing to play a more active and fun role in family life. Changing a baby dipper was still a step too far for most though!

From a young age, girls were raised to be a model wife and mother. The house work was endless and the pressure to be respectable and conform to what was expected was huge.

Remember how hard your Mom would do the laundry and check the whites before they went out on the line for the neighbors to judge? Neighbors looked out for you. Neighbors kept an eye on you. There was nowhere to hide!

If someone was missing from the dinner table there would have to be a good excuse. Wasting food was unthinkable, so Mom kindly gave you two choices, take it or leave it.

If you were brave enough to leave it, you'd probably be given it for your next meal anyway, so you soon learned to eat what you were given.

The real miracle though, is how you have survived that most dreaded remedy of all, the lick and spit. One speck of dirt on your face and out would come the hanky from Mom's sleeve. That speck of dirt didn't have a chance against Mom's hanky and that little dab of spit in it!

We would spend time listening to the radio, reading, playing cards or board games. When television arrived, arm chairs were turned from the fire to face the screen and everyone gathered to watch a program. Dad in charge of viewing, kids on the floor legs crossed, Mom would be knitting or darning something.

After an exhausting day playing outdoors or when you felt a little down, being tucked tightly in to a freshly made, perfectly smooth bed by Mom or Dad was such a wonderful feeling. Some modern things may make life easier but they just don't have the special comforting quality of old fashioned sheets and blankets, do they?

Ahh just to go back and remember, It's fun to close your eyes and drift back even for a short time and see Mom and Dad and "those good old days"!
