Sports wagering bill likely dead for this session, says sponsor

INSIDER LOUISVILLE

The lead sponsor of legislation to legalize and regulate wagering on sporting events in Kentucky says his bill is now unlikely to pass in the current session of the General Assembly, but he is hopeful it will have a better chance at becoming law next year.

Rep. Adam Koenig, R-Erlanger, told Insider Louisville on Tuesday that House Bill 175 is likely dead for the session, despite its unanimous passage out of a House committee last month and bipartisan support.

"Nothing is really dead until midnight on the last day of session, but needing a supermajority of votes was too high a bar to get in a short time period," said Koenig.

While a simple majority is needed to pass legislation in even-numbered years, bills that appropriate or raise revenue require a 60 percent vote in each chamber during the shorter non-budget sessions of odd-numbered years.

Spurred on by a

Supreme Court of the United States ruling last May striking down the national ban on sports wagering, HB 175 would set up a regulatory framework for Kentucky residents to legally bet on sports, online poker and fantasy sports contests, with the state receiving revenue from new taxes, registration fees and licensing fees.

Under the bill, Kentuckians would be allowed to bet on sporting events at licensed horse tracks, where they could also download a mobile app
