— Check your biases: Confirmation bias leads people to put more stock into information that confirms their beliefs and discount information that doesn't.

The digital world — social media platforms and the Internet — has become a blessing and a curse. We have the chance to communicate and connect on a level most other generations could have only dreamed. With that ability comes a certain responsibility, though.

There are other practical ways to make sure the news you're consuming and sharing is reliable. Think about what you are reading. Verify the source before you share it. Seek a second opinion.

As users become more aware of how to discern between reliable and unreliable news, social media platforms need to continue to do their parts to reduce the spread of inaccurate or fake news.

If both parties — users and developers — are setting their targets on eliminating fake news, we can ensure a better-informed society.

Be a responsible news-gatherer and do your research. If it seems too good (or bad) to be true, it probably is.
