Paw paw

"Father" of paw paws

Vince Martin said that Neal Peterson of Harpers Ferry is the true "Father" of the paw paw. Peterson developed six patented varieties of paw paws—Shenandoah, Susquehanna, Rappahannock, Allegheny, Potomac and Wabash—and is now touting his seventh premium paw paw variety Tallahatchie.

Peterson ate some ripe paw paws while on a hike in 1975 when he was studying for his master's degree in plant genetics at West Virginia University. He wondered why there wasn't mass cultivation of paw paws and paw paws for sale at grocery stores. It became his mission. Peterson sells his select varieties of the fruit and trees and their website provides a wealth of information about growing paw paws.

Vince Martin said that Macintosh Fruit Farm in Berryville, Virginia grows and sells paw paws every September.

The Martins went there a couple of years ago and bought some paw paws. He noted that an excellent source of data about paw paws is the Andrew Moore book "Paw Paw."

Whether wild or cultivated, paw paws have a special place in the hearts of locals that hike to find them and bake goodies made with their sweet and unique fruit.
