Card

While the card is quick proof of coronavirus vaccination, experts told Chiu that it is not a legal document.

What should you do with it? It is recommended that you take a picture of the card as a backup copy and keep the original stored in a safe place that is easily accessible. Other experts recommend making hard copies of the card and keeping them in a secure location.

Caution was also advised regarding posting photos of your card on social media without obscuring your personal information. "Your name is on there, your date of birth, the lot number of the vaccine that you receive," Michael Knight, assistant professor of medicine and the patient safety officer at George Washington University Medical Faculty Associates told Chiu. "You don't want an opportunity for individuals to have personal information that they can use for identity theft or other untoward activities."

Should you laminate the card? The concern here is that laminating it will complicate things if booster shots are needed in the future. To avoid this, one expert suggested laminating a copy of the card.

Where will you need to show your card? This question remains up in the air. Perhaps ring your vaccination record, or a copy of it, when you travel since travel requirements are rapidly changing and it's best to be prepared.
