Why We Give Thanks

"I will give thanks to you, Lord, with all my heart; I will tell of all your wonderful deeds."
Psalm 9:1 NIV

We are sometimes tempted to think that we are self-made men and women, that we worked hard for everything we have and that we don't owe anything to anyone. We couldn't be more wrong. We have inherited virtually everything, from our genetic/physical makeup to our culture, our language and the institutions that support our lives. We owe a debt of gratitude which we can never repay to both our forebears and to God, the ultimate source of our existence. Perhaps because we went to college and now have a job making decent money, we feel that we have done it all ourselves, when in fact going to college is more like standing on the shoulders of giants than inventing the wheel. We should give thanks for those who came before us, who contributed to our culture's ongoing experiment and helped to build the edifice of knowledge and culture. And just as nobody can adequately thank his or her parents for his existence, nobody can thank God for existence itself. We find ourselves thrown into the world, and being thankful, and perhaps a bit awestruck is the appropriate sentiment. Why we are here is a mystery to be pondered over the course of a long and hopefully thankful life.
