Broadcast journalism class giving CHS students real-world experience cast journalism didn't get to experience all of the different aspects to the class, especially since some students opted for virtual instruction. This year, however, with everyone physically back in school, the students in broadcast journalism can have a better understanding of what the class has to offer.

First-year broadcast journalism student Michael Odie says he is having a good experience so far in the class.

"I really enjoy it. Mr. Chance always allows us to be ourselves.

He always guides us in the right direction, while also allowing us to have fun all the time. I really enjoy it."

Odie says he wants to go into the broadcasting field later in his life.

"I took this class because I knew that it would teach me the basics of both broadcasting and journalism. So far, it has taught me both of these things. I can't wait to see what the rest of the year has in store for me," said Odie.

While running the cameras and setting up the jumbotron can be a rigorous task, it can also be a great learning experience. Junior Brian Ramirez-Morales said he appreciates how important it is to gain experience about how to set everything up.

"Mr. Chance always wants us to be able to do any job possible. Some days, we have to set up cameras. Some days, we work with audio; and some days, we do a little bit of everything. I personally think it is great to get to learn all of the elements that are a part of broadcasting."

There are also moments where Chance allows his students to do their own thing. No matter what it may be, Chance is always willing to let his students try new things.

Junior Arrington Richardson said Chance is just flexible with the class.

"He always allows us to film whatever we want to and make it into our own special thing," said Richardson. "He allows us to be unique and also learn about how to properly film videos and edit them, as well."
