system by 2050.

Achieving that goal, however, relies on keeping the state's nuclear power fleet online, and Exelon has threatened to close two or more nuclear plants that it says are unprofitable unless it receives subsidies to make them economically viable.

But many lawmakers have been skeptical of Exelon's claims, in large part because of the company's connection with ComEd. Last year, ComEd entered a deferred prosecution agreement with federal authorities in which the company admitted to engaging in a yearslong bribery scheme that involved awarding jobs and contracts to close associates of former Illinois House Speaker Michael Madigan in order to gain his support for legislation favorable to the company.

At issue in the talks over an energy package is the question of how much of a subsidy the nuclear plants need, how long the subsidies should last and how to phase out the state's remaining coal- and gas-fired power plants while creating new energy-related jobs for the workers who would be displaced.

"That's a complex issue," House Speaker Emanuel "Chris" Welch, D-Hillside, said during a 3 a.m. news conference shortly after the House adjourned early Tuesday. "And you know, we were close, and we're going to continue to work on it, and hopefully, we'll have something soon, because we were very close tonight." Meanwhile, Democrats were touting their achievements during the session on a range of other issues that included passage of a redistricting plan, an ethics reform bill, election changes, an affordable housing program and new protections for immigrants in Illinois.

"We got a lot more to do but this was a great start," Welch said during the news conference. "You guys have witnessed, I think, some important history here today."

Republicans, on the other hand, remained harshly critical of what happened during the session, particularly with the budget and the redistricting plan, which was done despite the fact that the release of official census data has been delayed until mid-August at the earliest.

"Their priority is not the little guy," House Minority Leader Jim Durkin said in a separate news conference Tuesday morning. "It's not the little guy who lost out over the past year, that's the small businessman who, it was determined, that they were not essential. The ones that had to shut down, they had to cut their workforce, the ones who barely kept their doors open. And where are they right now? They are not a priority for the House nor Senate Democrats."

Some bills pushed by Democrats fail to pass in the final days of the legislative session

Abortion notification repeal, drug decriminalization and midwife licensing among failed bills

In the final days of the legislative session, lawmakers passed bills to allow for college sports betting, to phase out isolation and seclusion practices at school, and to create more affordable housing units.

Despite the hectic rush to move important legislation by the May 31 deadline, some consequential bills did not come up for a final vote.

A bill to repeal the parental notification requirement for young girls seeking an abortion didn't come up for a vote. Bills to license professional midwives and decriminalize small amounts of drugs passed in the House but not the Senate.

While these bills appeared to be stalled this spring session, they could still be taken up for a vote if lawmakers return to session later this summer to address energy legislation.

Repeal law requiring abortion parental notification for minors

House and Senate Democrats filed bills (House Bill 1797 and Senate Bill 2091) to repeal a 1995 abortion law that requires girls under the age of 18 who are seeking an abortion to notify their parents at least 48 hours before the procedure, with some exceptions.

Under the current law, the notice requirement doesn't apply if a minor is accompanied by an adult family member, such as a parent, grandparent, stepparent or legal guardian, or if an adult family member waives the notice in writing.

There are additional exceptions to the 48-hour notice requirement, including for minors who are victims of physical or sexual abuse or neglect by an adult family member.

Another exception in the law, referred to as "judicial bypass," allows for minors to obtain a court waiver, if the minor can show she is mature and well-informed enough to make the decision to obtain an abortion, or that it is not in their best interest to notify an adult family member.

Both bills are stalled in committees, and neither received a vote by the full House or Senate.

Creation of state licensing for professional midwives

House Bill 3401 would allow certified professional midwives to obtain official state licensing.

Currently, certified professional midwives are not eligible for licensing through the state, unlike certified nurse midwives, which are a separate occupation that requires a nursing degree.

CPMs are licensed in 35 states and Washington, D.C.

The bill would create the Licensed Certified Professional Midwife Practice Act to license individuals who perform out-of-hospital births and have earned the credentials associated with being a professional midwife through the North American Registry of Midwives.

HB 3401 defines the practice of midwifery as the "means of providing the necessary supervision, care, and advice to a client during a low-risk pregnancy, labor and the post-partum period, including the intended low-risk delivery of a child, and providing normal newborn care."

The bill passed with bipartisan support in the House, by a vote of 105-2, but was never taken up for a vote by the full Senate.

Reclassifying small amounts of drugs from felonies to misdemeanors

House Bill 3447 would reclassify small amounts of drug possession, including heroin and cocaine, from a low-level felony to a misdemeanor.

Under the bill, a person who possesses less than three grams of heroin would be charged with a Class A misdemeanor. Currently, that offense would be charged as a Class 4 felony, which carries a one- to four-year prison sentence.

Misdemeanors under the bill would also include possession of less than five grams of cocaine, less than five pills of most schedule III substances such as Xanax and Valium, and less than 40 pills of oxycodone and similar painkillers. Class A misdemeanors are punishable by a jail sentence of less than one year.

It would also reclassify some low-level drug dealing offenses as a Class 4 felony, from a Class 3 felony.

HB 3447 passed narrowly out of the House, by a 61-49 vote, with just one vote more than needed. The Senate did not take up the bill for a full vote.
