Peggy's Ponderings

Well, we are putting things into hibernation for the coming winter months here at the Circle S. The big John Deeres have been cleaned, oiled, and parked inside the barn. All my fruits and vegetables have been, killed by the first frost, and pulled up and the refuse thrown away. Leaves and pine straw have been raked and raked as they continue to fall, and the lawn mower has been housed to rest until the spring of the year.

I have melancholy feelings spring forth each year at this time of year. I miss the green of everything that spring and a warm bed maybe an hour or so earlier, and getting up before sunrise and watch as the sun makes its way over the eastern part of the ranch and sets a glow to all it touches.

On this day, two weeks from today, my family, all that can, will be here to celebrate all that we are so thankful for and to celebrate my husband's, (pawpaw) birthday. Thanksgiving Day is the actual day he was born, and it happens ev-summer bring, the colorful flowers, the delicious vegetables, and even the smell of cut grass. As I look and walk into the crowded woods surrounding our little house, I see trees stripped clean of the green and lately colorful leaves, leaving only the skeleton of the many trees and so much pine straw and debris underneath. It always makes me think of rest that nature gives to us to replenish the earth and ourselves.

Winter is a slower time of living and existing. There are no outside chores that demand our time, other than maybe chopping some wood or feeding hay to our black cows. There are not too many outside cookings or picnics on the back porch or playing outside with my little JoJo till the night calls us in as it calls earlier at this time.

But there are nights of sitting by the warmth of the roaring fire, eating supper an hour or so earlier, getting into
