Arthur's 'Great Bank Robbery' of 1899

It was a bone-chilling zero degrees outside that early morning in January.

A little after 12 midnight, six masked bandits, having already stolen some of the tools they would need for their crime from other businesses in town, chiseled and punched out the lock on the protective grating door of the First National Bank of Arthur and then pried open the north side entrance door of the bank.

The vault had 30-inch thick brick walls and a floor of solid concrete. The vault had two sets of doors, each made of half-inch hardened steel. But these obstacles proved little resistance to the expert safe-crackers.

The armed bandits were soon standing in front of a Hall time-lock "burglar-proof" safe in no time. The safe had a 4-inch thick steel door and a money chest inside with 2.5-inch thick walls.

Just then, a young German fellow from Blue Island, who had come to visit his cousin, Joe Kanitz, came to town. The Kanitz family was sick and he had come to find a doctor. Thinking the two bandits who were standing outside the bank as lookouts were night watchmen, he asked them where he could find the residence of the town's doctor.

"Right in here," remarked one of the bandits and, to his amazement, the young man found himself looking into the muzzles of two large revolvers.

The robbers pulled him off his horse, marched him into the bank, placed the young man on the floor, and compelled him to remove his shoes. They searched his pockets, but took neither his money nor his watch.

One bandit kept a gun on their young captive while the two lookouts returned to their positions outside the bank. They told the young man there would be an explosion in a few minutes, but if would remain quiet he would not be hurt.

The safe-crackers did not try to drill the safe, but, instead, were going to "blow" it with nitroglycerin. By using a blowpipe or air pump, they carefully injected the nitro into the top crack of the door.

The young captive was getting nervous at all these events and, when he saw one of the robbers get a rope, he thought, "If it was hanging me they were after, I'd better be getting out."

One of the robbers lit a long fuse that led to the safe while the others took cover.

The explosion propelled steel parts from the safe through the front window of the bank and through the window of the Odd Fellows building clear across the street.

The young man ran and, with all his might, jumped against the guards and fled out the door. As the young man ran across the street without his shoes he fell down on the frozen ground, and the bullets from the bandits' guns passed over his head. He sailed up Vine Street yelling, "help" and "murder" at every breath.

The robbers, after letting their prisoner escape, hurriedly gathered up all the valuables they could find in the blown safe, and made their way to the Vandalia train house where they stole a hand car and headed to Arcola on the railroad tracks.

The next day, bloodhounds were called in from Sullivan and a Pinkerton Detective Agency man arrived on the scene with some clue as to who the perpetrators were.

He reported that the work was done by "experts" who divided up in Arcola. Three went north by freight train that morning and three went south on another train.

But the suspects were never caught and had managed to get away with gold, silver, and paper money amounting to $3,720 along with diamonds valued at around $300, an amount equivalent to approximately $150,000 today.

The editor of the Arthur Graphic put it this way, "Our city will be familiarly spoken of in the annals of crime yet to be written and we will rank along with Coffeyville, Kansas and other western towns where outlaws have reigned supreme..."
