Making Amends

It is important to make amends for the wrongs we have committed, humbly and sincerely apologizing to those we have hurt and trying to redress the wrongs. In recovery circles (AA and NA, for example), steps numbers 8 and 9 of their 12-step programs address this issue. Making amends is crucial for people in recovery because if they don't do this, they are carrying around all kinds of emotional baggage such as guilt and shame, which can be a trigger to drink or use drugs. What I've learned over the years is that the sooner I make my apologies the better, since the apology almost immediately begins to improve my relations with the other person and thus both of us begin to feel better. For minor sins, the apology can come right after the act, in the same breath as it were. But for more serious wrongs it may require asking for time to sit down with the other person and humbly asking for their forgiveness. And this isn't just something that recovering substance abusers should do. All of us should make daily inventories of our lives and seek to make amends to those we've wronged. It's wise to remember that we are human and we're likely to need this practice until our final days.
