FAITH CAN MOVE MOUNTAINS

Unconditional Friendliness

The word "Maitri" is a Sanskrit word meaning benevolence, kindness or even friendliness and it is an important concept in Buddhism. There are a variety of meditations based on this concept wherein we are instructed to think about our friends and family, even strangers and enemies in a loving way, saying (or thinking) things like "may you be happy" or "may you be free from suffering" while directing loving thoughts towards the objects of our affection. A practical way to put maitri into effect is to simply treat everyone with unconditional friendliness. We can sometimes treat family and friends harshly and just as charity begins at home, so does friendliness. We should extend this friendliness to our coworkers and fellow students at school. And even when we are dealing with perfect strangers or people who treat us poorly, we should always choose friendliness. It may seem odd to be friendly with someone who is insulting you, or worse, robbing you, but that might turn out to be the best way to survive such an interaction. Imagine telling a robber that they don't need to rob you as you will gladly give them what they need. It might save your life and perhaps turn the person around. A home invasion is likely to be a scary event, but if you were to suggest that you'd be happy to help the invaders load up their vehicle, you'd probably survive the event and perhaps shame them into rethinking their crime.
