Food Assistance

(From Toluca Front Page) sell almost exclusively low-priced items and so must sell a lot of product to make up for small sales, said Craig Norrenberns, a fourth-generation Illinois grocer.

"We're in what we call the penny business, meaning that, like, we count and we survive on the penny," Norrenberns said. And because grocers deal with many perishable items, it's very easy to lose that profit, he added.

Norrenberns is a member of the Illinois Retail Merchants Association, which represents independent and corporate grocers of all sizes.

Retailers have the narrowest profit margin of all business sectors, IRMA President Rob Karr said. Within that, grocers have the narrowest profit margins, averaging between 1% and 2%.

Tariffs and fuel prices have a "major impact" on retailers, who deal in transporting, packing and importing a lot of products, Karr said.

Add stiff competition to that, and SNAP cuts will put grocers at "real risk for closure," Karr said. When communities lose independent grocers, it impacts their ability to access food, especially products like fresh produce.

"It might actually have the inverse effect of driving more people into supplemental programs like SNAP," Karr said.
